Before a greatly increased and en-Infsiastic audience at the Concervatory of Music last night Dr. Edward Howard Griggs of New York delivered the fourth of his series of lectures of dramas of protest, taking as his subject "Brand," the protest against time serving selfishness, which is Ibsen's stern arraignment of his own Norwegian countrymen for refusing to stand for the same purpose, by Denmark in the conflict with Prussia; also in this great drama, he is the conscious teacher, affirming the herosm born of the unselfish battle for high ideals, his fundamental thesis being that life is worth while only when dedicated. The greatness of Brand, the man, lies in his complete dedication of will to one great cause, but his weakness is in his failing to see that the will must be guided by love-a weakness that leads him to break his wife, the lovely Agnes, on the wheel, for he requires of her that she give all or nothing, even to the little cap and the memory of their dead child, and the nother in relinquishing them reminds Brand that one who looks upon the face of Jehovah cannot five. Dr. Griggs sointed out that Ibsen's protest is against cowardice and weakness and in ment declared that war has its virmes, often bringing out the glorious and the heroic, even in the meanest, while next week in their new residence, 1428 the crimes of peace are sometimes West Forty-first street. worse than those of war, although it is only when heroism is united with love that achievement is hoped for.
